Judge King Confident.

Judge Will R. King was a visitor in Baker between trains yesterday morning on his return home to Portland from Vale, where he has been attending to some legal matters.

While Judge King was not given to talk for publication, he expressed himself in a Democrat representative of the old. Cut off some the secretary of interior's private office, but in the same order the incoming presidential appointee is taking very confident of securing a higher standard of efficiency, and, was speaking from personal experience, he thought the change would be good work.

Would Change the Day.

In the east a movement has been on foot to change the date of January 1st from May 30 either to the last Sunday in April or to the Sunday immediately following May 30. The proposition is receiving considerable attention. The idea is to lessen the hardship in observing the anniversary of a reverent observance of the day, usually marked in southern and eastern states, falling other holidays. It has come to be an occasion merely for promotion of sports and for other amusements to rate extra dollars by reason of offerings. Instead of being observed the day has been converted into a holiday.

This is becoming true in many states of all days that have distinctive bearing on the calendar. Every holiday is subject to similar tendency, and the actual reasons is utterly lessened. The Fourth of July has reached the stage of such anxious license that it is seriously contemplated by reform forward definite measures for reform, and it has worked to a satisfactory extent. It seems that the complaint would be extended in other directions. Not infrequently we hear people wonder why, and believe the broken are not on the patriotic associations of such will be wholly forgotten.

Particularly in the case of Memorial day there is an approach to heartless in the remoteness of its meaning. Possibly the proposed change of date may do some good, though there is a good deal of sentiment in the old date. Perhaps it would be better if we were to force reform by recommendation as a test, safeguard it if expediency gave way to the [illegible] from merely shifting the date of their connections with a Pocatello Tribune.
