SALE OF CITY WATER

This Plant Cannot Be Sold Without the Consent of the Legal Voters

The City of St. Paul, Minn., is authorized to sell the water works plant to the highest bidder, but the sale is subject to the approval of the legal voters of the city. The water works plant is one of the most valuable assets of the city, and its sale should be in the best interests of the public. The city council has passed a resolution authorizing the sale, but the voters must first decide whether they wish to sell the plant.

The water works plant consists of the pumping station, the water tower, and the distribution system. The plant is currently owned and operated by the city. The sale of the plant would result in the city receiving a large sum of money, which could be used for other public purposes. However, the sale of the plant would also result in the loss of control over the water supply to the city's residents.

The voters will be asked to vote on the question of whether they wish to sell the water works plant. The sale would be subject to the approval of the voters, and the city council would be authorized to sell the plant to the highest bidder if the voters approve the sale.

NO QUARTERLY STATEMENTS RENDERED

The Law is Very Plain On That Subject—Why Has It Been Evaded?

The law is very plain on the subject of quarterly statements. The law requires that the city council render quarterly statements to the voters. However, the city council has evaded this requirement for many years. The voters are entitled to know how the city is spending their money, and the city council has a duty to provide this information to the voters.
